

AmericanRhetoric.com

Mitch Landrieu

Address at the Katrina 5 Commemoration & Determination Ceremony

delivered 29 August 2010, Mahalia Jackson Theater, New Orleans, Louisiana

AUTHENTICITY CERTIFIED: Text version below transcribed directly from audio and edited for continuity

Thank you. Thank you, Brian, and thank all of you for being here.

We're here tonight to mark the anniversary of the day that everything changed. It has been five years since that fateful storm barreled through the Gulf. Five years since the levees broke and drowned our city. Five years, and we still grieve for the one thousand eight hundred and thirty six Americans who lost their lives and who have left us in mourning.

We must think back and remember, to what seems like so long ago. The days and the moments that have been etched into our memories flood back to us like the rising water.

Oppressive heat, pitch black nights, confusion and fear -- it all rushes back, a torrent of sights, of sounds, of smells.

An abandoned, but not empty city, still and eerily silent. People stranded, trapped by the rising water, tattered white sheets waving at the sky, screams from the roof tops filled with anguish: "We are still alive!"

The hum of a boat's motor, the silence of a corpse laying face down in the water, a man holding his dog, standing motionless -- there were no words.

AmericanRhetoric.com

A woman in a tattered dress clutching a clock, because it was the only thing she had left. She wouldn't let it go. She said she didn't "have nothin.'" She said she didn't "know nothin.'" But at least she knew what time it was.

Tented emergency rooms hastily erected in the blazing sun in the shadow of the Convention Center. Makeshift beds on the Super Dome floor, wet and close; children crying, hope fading. Three thousand souls stuck in a sweltering shed in the Port of St. Bernard, waiting.

People, like apparitions, defiantly emerging from the water -- head first, shoulders second -- holding a black garbage bag filled with the only things that they had left. Some people made it out. Others did not.

Vera Smith lay dead on the corner of Magazine and Jackson. For days the street was her grave, a thin, white sheet covering her frail body; a simple epitaph written in black permanent marker, "Here lies Vera. God help us."

Grandmas and grandpas died in storm battered hospitals and nursing homes. They were left on cots in a crowded chapel that became a makeshift morgue. In a city where everything broke down, in a time where nothing was just or fair, they were part of "the greatest generation" who saved the world, and we could not save them.

And then, there were others. Today eighty-five bodies lay unclaimed in the Katrina Memorial. These fathers and mothers, brothers and sisters, friends and neighbors died as our city was torn apart.

We will always remember them and tonight we will pay silent respect.

[Silent respect observed]

We must face the truth that in the fifth year of the 21st century, for four horrific days, there was anarchy on the streets of America. The levees broke and our government failed. It is a moment in time that we should never forget and one that we should never, ever, ever repeat.

Now, while our city was shrouded in darkness like never before, we found salvation, light, and hope from the angels among us. And there were so many.

These angels were young black boys pushing an old white man in a rusted wheelchair searching for water; an old white women holding the hand of a crying young black girl who had lost her mother; a minister from Dallas who snuck into the city to help feed people; and strangers all over, pressed together by circumstance, leaning on each other for comfort and support.

With the rising water, differences and divisions were washed away.

AmericanRhetoric.com

Our homes inundated, tattoos with X's and gutted to the bone. Three feet of water -- on the second floor; mud caked everywhere; the unforgettable stench of a rotten refrigerator; mold spreading along floor boards and growing like ivy up the walls and across our ceilings; a mighty Mardi Gras Indian headdress, swept away; a favorite blanket or dress left behind, now gone. So many photo albums, letters, birthdays, recipes -- lost in the water, forever. A loved one whose final resting place was never supposed to be the attic.

Everything was grey. Our lives had lost color, but we endured together. For a time, we carried our pain like a beast of burden, and it became a part of us. Our sorrow ran deep and dark like the water, and every day it was there, hovering, never, ever, ever letting us go. Every conversation came back to the storm. Every lonely walk made us wish our friends would come home. Every time we said goodnight, we said it to someone we had lost.

But then, there was a moment: God troubled the water again and something began to change. Our sorrow began to wane. Bit by bit, time smoothed the jagged edges of our memories. Families returned, and communities began to stand up. The grass began to turn green, and the flowers began to bloom.

And we knew, we knew we could not do this alone. Faith-based, national college groups streamed in from across the country. Neighbors helped each other. Together we took down dry wall, stretched blue tarps across torn roofs, and rebuilt brick by brick. People reached out. They came together in living rooms, in churches, in community centers throughout the city.

We cried. We laughed. We broke down. We held each other up. We felt fear. We felt guilt. And we felt frustration. We were battered, we were bruised, and we were scarred. But with grit and determination and help, the people of this city rose out of the water, bearing the burden together that none of us -- not one of us -- could bear alone.

Our resiliency leads us down a path -- the path to resurrection. Through our struggle we have found strength. Today we are forged by the fires of devastation that have tempered our resolute will and our determination. We believed that together we could come back. And we did.

We made a choice. We returned to a city that hope forgot because we believed in redemption, we believed in our culture, we believed in each other, and we believed in New Orleans.

Together we stand in this moment feeling the pull of the past and struggling to the future. Across the city, the candles we lit tonight offer remembrance; but they are also to light the way forward.

Here in New Orleans on this sacred soil, we are called to do something remarkable. It is time. It is time to turn tragedy into triumph. We must vow to create a better New Orleans.

AmericanRhetoric.com

To become the city of our dreams we must follow a righteous path guided by the lessons that we have learned from Katrina: Love thy neighbor; our diversity is our strength; and never, ever, ever give up. We cannot let these lessons fade. We are not rebuilding the city that we were. We are creating the city that we want to become.

To do this, we need to be better neighbors. Just as strangers helped each other during the storm, we've got to always have each other's back and build a community bonded by trust, by compassion, by justice -- one where our kids can play outside at night and the porches are full of laughter and stories shared by families and friends.

We need to be better parents to our children. Show empathy and honesty, humor and tolerance, and they will learn by our example. We need to spend more time together, than apart. And we must learn to listen and value what we all have to say. And when we truly listen, do you know what we will hear? We will hear and we will learn the beautiful truth that Katrina taught us all: We are all the same.

Parents in the East, and on the West Bank, Treme, and Lakeview, from St. Bernard to St. Tammany, Uptown, Downtown, Gert Town, and back a' town have the same high hopes for their kids and all gather around the same kitchen table. We sing the same songs. We root for the same Saints, and we share the same dreams. My children are your children; and together we all must take care of each other because, whether we believe it or not, our fate is intertwined.

After the storm we were forced to find higher common ground. From such great heights, we will renew our city. We will meet our new challenges just as we have before, together. Come hell or high water, we ain't goin' nowhere.

Together, we learned a lesson long forgotten. The value of our lives is not measured by the things that we own -- not by a house, not by a car, not by a building, not by a corner store. When we walked back in our wet, mud-caked houses, the things we reached for first were the pictures, pictures of our lives that reminded us that we belonged to a family -- something bigger than ourselves, something that gave us root. As long as we have each other, we have a home. As long as we cling to each other we will always have New Orleans. There is no storm big enough to take that from us. The only way we will lose it is if we give it away. And this we will not do.

Our journey will not end here. We have spent five long years proving that we can live again. We believe that tomorrow will always be better than today. So America, hear this: The people of New Orleans are still standing; we are unbowed and we are unbroken.

Still standing because of our desire to uplift and to overcome is strong.

Still standing because the fabric of our collective strength is unmatched.

AmericanRhetoric.com

Still standing because our spirit is undying.

Still standing, empowered by our shared struggle, determined to bestow the city of our dreams unto future generations forever.

Five years -- still standing.

Committed to strive, to seek, to find, and never, ever, ever to yield.

Thank you. God bless you. And God bless the people of New Orleans.